"We are part of the local community that wants to be part of a larger conversation, and we are able to connect them to a global conversation," she said. Indeed the firm focuses on local public housing, community centers, parks, and libraries because Nothard believes architects are, as she put it, 'cultural change agents and facilitators.' [...] Sunset Hammock, a public art project in Tamarac's Sunset Point Park, renders moments in time through increasing intensity and color. It explores the expansiveness of the Everglades through the study of wetland topographies and tectonic forms."
